In another time, when the feudal wars tore across ancient Japan, an epic battle raged between two fierce armies. The sole survivor of the losing force was a young spearman, Imoto. Knocked unconscious by a charging horse he sank unnoticed among his fallen comrades.

Regaining consciousness he fled the battlefield to the safety of the surrounding mountain forests. Injured and lost, Imoto stumbled upon a remote village huddled beside a cavernous pit. He collapsed with exhaustion.

Imoto awoke, bandaged, in a humble shack with a small man sitting next to him. “Ah, you are awake! I am Akagi, the leader of the village Tengumura. We are the keepers of the Gate that holds the Evil One. Fate has sent you to us in our hour of need.”

“If only it was only legend. Shizuka, the keeper of the Talisman that seals the gate, has been abducted by the Evil One’s henchmen. They will try to free him. We are not warriors. We can not fight through his legions to rescue Shizuka and the talisman from the Abyss. Fate has brought you here to stop the Evil One!”

Imoto slowly pushed himself to his feet. “Fate! My comrades lie silent in the valley, yet I live. I will fetch your Shizuka. Fate or legend, I will enter the Abyss!”

Long ago in the ancient Japanese Capital of Edo, a few yards from the bridge on the Old Kisokaido Road a small fire burned beneath a tree near the waters edge. Weary travelers were always invited to share the fire's warmth on dark winter nights. No one that accepted the hospitality of the fire ever returned to the road.

The Goulish hosts of this trap were a terrible Tengu and a crafty Kappa. Tengu would trick visitors into drinking a sleep potion. Once asleep they would roll the traveler and drag them into the water.

One December night, a traveler happened upon the trap carrying nothing but a drinking gourd and a silk purse. "Good evening, I am Hokusai, may I steal a bit of warmth from your fire?"

"I would be delighted with your company, as you see, my friend here has fallen asleep and isn't much fun," said Tengu. the scaly Kappa sat motionless beneath a wide hat and rice straw coat that hid his beak and shell back.

"Please sit! You must be tired!" invited Tengu from behind an expensive silk fan that hid his long, crooked nose. "The road is long and dry, please have a drink." He held out a ladle dripping with the wicked elixir.

Hokusai patted his drinking gourd and smiled. "You are too kind, my friend but I am afraid this is all I need."

"But you have traveled two days from the last well. Please try some fresh water," entreated Tengu.

"No my friend, this gourd is neither stale nor empty. On the contrary, it is never stale nor empty, for this is a magic gourd!"
beamed Hokusai.

“A magic gourd! Indeed!” chuckled Tengu.

“But it is true! I stole this from the witch, Hannya!” said Hokusai. “I can prove it’s magic! Just watch this!” With that, Hokusai twisted the cork from the gourd
and cautiously sipped a tiny amount.
Instantly Hokusai grew several inches!
His kimono barely covered his knees and his hat set upon his head like a lid on a teapot.

Tengu dropped the ladel to the ground in suprise. “It’s true!
The gourd is magic! I must have it! I’ll pay anything!” shouted Tengu.

“But this is magic,” reasoned Hokusai. “How can you put a price on something like this? You are very generous my friend but...well, you understand.”

“I will trade magic for magic! Behold!” declared Tengu with a mischievous gleam in his eyes. With the slightest flick of his beautiful silk fan, a small tornado churned out of the river.
Within seconds a powerful waterspout whirled and danced on the river. Then, as quickly as it began, the twister stopped.

“Amazing,” remarked Hokusai not aware that it was the Tengu’s own magic and not the fan that conjured the tornado.
After contemplating the deal a few seconds, the traveler agreed.
Tengu snapped the fan closed, revealing his crooked nose and his crooked grin, full of crooked teeth. Then, as Hokusi handed him the gourd, Tengu cast over the painted fan and revealed his crooked intention.

Wrenching the cork from the vessel, Tengu up-ended the gourd, pouring its contents down his throat. Tengu dropped the gourd and grabbed his throat, his eyes wide and his cheeks bloated with fluid.

“Pahoooooo!” Tengu spit forth a spray of the liquid that erupted into a huge fireball as it reached the flames.

“OIL! It’s full of oil!” screamed Tengu, still choking and shaking his head. The roar of the exploding campfire startled Kappa so much that he rolled back, spilling the water in the dished out crown of his head. Kappa knew that without this reserve he was totally powerless on land so he dashed for the safety of the river.

Tengu howled in rage. Drawing his sword he flew over the flames to attack the little fool. Instead of toppling the traveler, Tengu slammed into something as big as a tree and twice as hard.

Tengu found himself at the feet of a hairy giant admiring his beautiful silk fan.

“Tanuki! You tricked me! Give me back my fan this instant!” squealed Tengu, his eyes aflame.

“It is my fan, you thief! Give it back!”
“Ah Tengu, you carry on so! I had no idea a fan meant so much to you!”

“Give it back,” smoke was starting to roll from Tengu’s ears. Tanuki pretended to look concerned. “Well, now Tengu don’t get upset. We can trade back. Just give me back my gourd.” Tengu picked up the gourd and tossed it back at Tenuki’s feet. The giant bent down and picked up the jug then smiled craftily at Tengu.

“Now give me my fan! A deal’s a deal...You said so yourself!” snorted Tengu.

“And so I did...” said Tenuki. Plucking a leaf from the top of the sycamore tree he bent down and placed it on Tengu’s hand, “and here is your fan.”

Tengu was so furious he could not speak. All he could do was just mumble and kick at the ground as Tenuki returned to the road, starting out again in his human form. Tengu was so humiliated he decided to move his treasures into a nearby cave and spend the rest of eternity underground.
